EXPOSITION

1911

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA IS REPRESENTED AT THE EXPOSITION BY:

A FEW WORDS

The collection of American Paintings and Sculpture which has been contributed by artists and owners to the Roman Exposition of 1911, and which is installed in the Pavilion especially erected under the appropriation made by the Congress of the United States, is characteristic of the prevailing taste and ideals of Art in the United States at this day.

Not since 1900 at Paris has any national display of American Art appeared in Europe. This collection is therefore illustrative of some new tendencies and of the greater concentration of aims which the spirit of self-reliance has awakened in the last decade.

Owing to limitations of space and means the arts of mural painting and of architecture now flourishing in the United States are, with a single exception omitted.

As the international competition at Rome has limited works to the years between 1901 and 1911, no attempt was made to include earlier productions, and, indeed, the restricted means allowed would not admit of a retrospective collection.

The Pavilion devoted to American Art in the Roman Exposition was intended to present to Europe an architectural idea well recognized in the United States but known only slenderly abroad. A modern, suburban house, such as families occupy near the great cities was the model, which necessarily suffered many modifications in adapting it for galleries. The brick is of the type now being extensively used in America. It is called "Tapisstry" brick and its designs will show how rich such work may, in more elaborate schemes of color, become. It was especially imported from America for this building, and is made by Fiske and Co. of New York.

Warm acknowledgments are due to the architects who designed the Pavilion, Messrs. Carrère and Hastings, and to their representative on the ground, Mr. R. T. Pryor. The lamented death of Mr. Carrère at the moment of sailing to supervise the work is recorded with profound and enduring regret.

Abundant acknowledgments are also due to those patrons of American Art, an increasingly numerous band of men and women of taste and individual judgment, and to the many Art Institutions of the United States, who have unselfishly lent their treasures for the period of this Exposition. Their names are recorded gratefully under the numbers which they have contributed.

To all American artists thanks are overflowing due for their support in substantial contributions for a long period in a distant land.

It remains to say that, while resources for a larger building or a more extensive collection of works were not assigned, the pictures and sculpture installed in the American Pavilion on its picturesque hill top, with a matchless view of the Exposition and of the romantic Alban Hills, contains an epitome of American Art of the present day which illustrates all tendencies and which has given all who strive genuinely a chance to demonstrate their claims.

H. S. M.

¶ No photographs may be taken of pictures or sculpture without the permission of the officials in charge.

Many works in the collection are for sale. Prices may be learned from the Secretary General at the Pavilion.
